NEW ARTS SIX

NEW ARTS SIX was founded in 1981 by six Dallas-based African-American women who saw a need to revitalize the musical legacy of African-Americans. The identification of this need led them to their mission - to preserve, promote and perform the ethnic folk music of African-Americans - the Spiritual. The Spiritual, also known as The Sorrow Song, is both social and political. The Spiritual grew out of a rebellion against slave masters. It reflects, as African background, a life on Southern plantations and an unforgettable record of a people being dehumanized.

Theologically, the Spiritual allows one to understand how the divine spirit moves black people toward unity and determination, and how they created their own religion from the remnants of both African and Christian beliefs. Three central themes in the Spiritual are: a desire for freedom (freedom from bondage and freedom in bondage); a desire for justice; and, a desire to gain an everlasting future. The Black Spiritual is the essence of many forms of popular music: jazz, gospel and blues. The Spiritual is a pure American art form, a social and political statement, and an integral part of African-American historical and cultural development. The power of the music comes directly from the Black experience and tradition.

From the beginning, New Arts Six has produced original works utilizing Spirituals to musically record a page of history or folk tradition. These original works are commissioned by New Arts Six and produced by in-house writer/performer Gale Washington Tyler and prominent African-American playwrights like Rudy Eastman of Ft. Worth's Jubilee Theatre and Dr. Arthur L. Allen of Allen Children's Theater and Goober Productions. The ensemble is equally inspired by Dallas author/journalist/musician Rosalyn M. Story, whose book And So I Sing relates the stories of African-American women who achieved operatic careers despite artistic, social and racial barriers.

SPECIAL NOTES ABOUT THEATRE THREE

Even before the Civil Rights legislation of the early '60's, Theatre Three began championing the work of African-American actors, writers, directors and musicians. Theatre Three has introduced Dallas to eminent black playwrights like August Wilson (whose plays, Ma Rainey's Black Bottom, Joe Turner's Come and Gone and The Piano Lesson, received Southwestern premieres here); Ntazake Shange (For Colored Girls...); and, Ossie Davis (Purlie Victorious and the book for the subsequent musical, Purlie). Theatre Three staged the world premiere of Stringbean, which starred Leslie Uggams, a play-with-music biography of the young Ethel Waters (written by Lanie Robertson, author of Lady Day at the Emerson Bar and Grill).

Because Dallas is the home of so many superbly talented black performers, those artists have been featured at Theatre Three in numerous "non-traditional" roles as well. In addition, Theatre Three has had previous joint ventures with Dallas Black Dance Theatre, with Houston's Ensemble Theatre, and with Vivid Theatre Ensemble for Manchild In The Promised Land, adapted for the stage by Robert Earl Price, based on Claude Brown's autobiography and co-produced with Michael Skipper. Theatre Three is proud to join again with New Arts Six for this latest joint venture.
